ABSTRACT:

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar, a prominent social reformer, law specialist, and the main planner of India's constitution, assumed a significant part in the liberation of ladies in India. This theoretical features the critical commitments of Dr. Ambedkar towards advancing orientation correspondence and enabling ladies in a profoundly man centric culture. All through his life, Dr. Ambedkar fervently supported for the privileges and nobility of minimized networks, especially the Dalits (previously known as untouchables). Nonetheless, he perceived that the difficulties looked by Dalit ladies were doubly abusive because of their position and orientation characters. One of Dr. Ambedkar's earliest and most astounding drives in propelling ladies' liberation was major areas of strength for him on training. He immovably accepted that instruction was the way to freedom and strengthening. In his endeavors to kill ignorance, he energized Dalit young ladies and ladies to seek after training, moving conventional standards that confined them to homegrown jobs. Moreover, Dr. Ambedkar was a vocal pundit of kid marriage and battled for lawful measures to cancel this hurtful practice. He perceived the antagonistic effect of early relationships on ladies' physical and psychological well-being, frequently prompting their enslavement and weakness. His promotion prompted the presentation of legitimate changes that looked to safeguard ladies from ahead of schedule and constrained relationships.

One more huge part of Dr. Ambedkar's commitments to ladies' liberation was his obligation to orientation uniformity in the work environment. He pushed for monetary open doors and work privileges for ladies, particularly in the horticultural area, where Dalit ladies were frequently exposed to shifty practices. His endeavors brought about better working circumstances and a feeling of organization for some ladies who were recently minimized and persecuted.
Also, Dr. Ambedkar's endeavors in drafting the Indian Constitution were instrumental in cherishing ladies' privileges as basic freedoms. He upheld for orientation fairness and pushed for arrangements that shielded ladies' respect, right to property, and insurance against segregation. In addition, Dr. Ambedkar was a fervent ally of ladies' on the right track to political portrayal. He effectively lobbied for ladies' cooperation in the political cycle and was areas of strength for an of ladies' testimonial. His endeavors proved to be fruitful, and ladies acquired the option to cast a ballot in free India, subsequently opening the entryways for their political strengthening.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar's complex commitments to the liberation of ladies in India were noteworthy and groundbreaking. Through his support for schooling, lawful changes, financial strengthening, and political portrayal, he turned into an encouraging sign and a main thrust in the excursion towards orientation balance and ladies' strengthening in a general public set apart by well-established man controlled society and standing based separation. His heritage keeps on motivating ages, and his vision of a populist society stays a directing light for continuous endeavors towards ladies' liberation in India.

Key words: Gender Equality, Women’s Rights, Caste system, social reforms Women’s Empowerment.

Introduction: "If male education is persuaded to go hand in hand with female education, we will see better days soon and our progress will be greatly accelerated." – B.R. Ambedkar.

Objective of the paper:

1. To examine the key initiatives and efforts undertaken by Dr. B. R. Ambedkar to promote women's education and its impact on the empowerment of women in India.

2. To analyze Dr. Ambedkar's role in advocating for legal reforms and his fight against child marriage, exploring how these measures contributed to protecting women's rights and agency.

3. To assess the lasting influence of Dr. Ambedkar's contributions on women's political empowerment, particularly his advocacy for women's suffrage and its significance in shaping the representation and participation of women in Indian politics.

In the modern social realm of individual self-interest, economic competition, etc., which is a civil society. People are freed from assurance of their lives and characters by friendly position. It becomes possible to move up socially; through the pursuit of one's own self-interest, from rags to riches. Modern people ought to be able to choose their work, consumption, and lifestyle. It is believed that these decisions are "private" matters that are distinct from public or political life. In present day culture the political personalities of people are still up in the air by fixed social situations as in medieval social progressive system.
Dr. B.R. Ambedkar was one of the world's greatest intellectuals of the 20th century from India. In one of his essays, renowned Marxist economist Paul Baran distinguished between an "intellect worker" and an intellectual. He says that the former person uses his intellect to make a living, while the latter person uses it for critical analysis and social change. Dr. Ambedkar perfectly satisfies Barman's definition of an intellectual. Additionally, Dr. Ambedkar is a great example of what Antonio Grimace referred to as an organic intellectual: a person who represents and articulates the interests of a whole social class.

Dr. B R Ambedkar's political and social ideas During the discussion of his ideas, it was noted that he valued examining the underlying causes of social problems and held firm beliefs about the ideal Indian society. Additionally, he recommended measures to eradicate society's vices at the policy and social levels. An examination of Ambedkar's "Social and Political Ideas" has been carried out in the context of the topic of "Women Emancipation and Empowerment" in this article. The discussion of his concepts, vision, and policy recommendations regarding "Women Emancipation and Empowerment" is summarized at the chapter's conclusion.

A person's ability to make good choices and turn those choices into the actions and outcomes they want is what we mean when we talk about empowerment. The degree to which a person is able to make a choice and the opportunities that exist in the context of making a choice influence the extent to which a person is empowered. Thus, asset endowments like psychological, informational, organizational, material, social, financial, or human can be used to measure empowerment; and the degree of opportunity, such as the presence and operation of both formal and informal institutions, such as behavioral norms, laws, and regulatory frameworks. A process by which those who have been denied power gain power, particularly the ability to make strategic life choices, is another term for empowerment. The ability to choose a spouse, a livelihood, or whether or not to have children are examples for women. Three interconnected dimensions are required for the development of this power: control over and access to resources; achievements (the attainment of new social outcomes) and agency (the capacity to use these resources to create new opportunities). Therefore, empowerment is both a process and a result. This understanding is very different from instrumentalist interpretations, which only talk about empowerment in terms of measurable results. Instrumentalist interpretations are problematic because they undermine the idea that women's empowerment should be about their ability to make self-determined choices and convey the belief that social change can be predicted and prescribed in a cause-and-effect manner. As a multifaceted process of civil, political, social, economic, and cultural participation and rights, the scope of empowerment can be expanded. As a result, a number of important domains can be considered when analyzing this process. The domains may include, but are not limited to, sociodemographic indicators, bodily integrity and health, literacy and educational attainment, economic participation and rights, political participation and rights, cultural participation and rights, and so forth. After that, these can be used to evaluate women's capabilities (preconditions for the enjoyment of rights and enhancement of participation), participation (referring to an active social condition), and rights (referring to a formal, legal condition).
Women's empowerment necessitates challenging patriarchal power dynamics, which reduce women's control over their physical and intellectual resources. Women must first become aware of the ideology that justifies male dominance before they can participate in their own oppression. The empowerment process begins within, but external agents will provide access to new ideas and information. Women can assert their right to control resources and participate equally in decision-making with new awareness and strong solidarity. Eventually, ladies' strengthening should turn into a power that is a coordinated mass development which challenges and changes existing power relations in the public eye. However, there is no universal agreement regarding how women's empowerment should be measured. Basic ideas are up for debate, there isn't enough disaggregated data for analysis, and little is known about how families work. Civil and political rights, also known as "first generation" human rights, have received more attention from indicators and measurements than "second generation" economic, social, and cultural rights.

The growing recognition that women lack self-confidence, the opportunity to participate in decision-making processes, and control over resources prompts the need to "empower" them. The realization that women play an increasingly significant role in social and economic development has also gained widespread acceptance. Development efforts will only have a partial impact unless women are "empowered" to participate alongside men in the process. Therefore, rather than attempting "empowerment" on their own, empowerment strategies should attempt it through mainstream programs.3

People are empowered when they are able to make well-thought-out decisions about their lives. The empowerment process is influenced by two significant factors: agency (the capacity to make decisions) and control over resources (the conditions for empowerment). Therefore, for women to be empowered, they must have equal access to resources and opportunities like land and employment, as well as equal capabilities like education and health care. However, they must also be able to use these capabilities and resources to make strategic decisions. Women's empowerment is often seen as a result of education. There is frequently a correlation between women's participation in the formal social, political, and legal systems and girls' access to education. However, this assumes that girls are already equipped to evaluate their worth and imagine new opportunities by virtue of their education.4

The term "emancipation" is used to talk about a variety of efforts to get political rights or equality, usually for a specific group of people who aren't allowed to vote, but it can also be used to talk about such issues more broadly. In the political discourse of the 18th and 19th centuries, the term emancipation was frequently used, such as in Catholic or Jewish emancipation movements, and female suffrage was a major goal of women's emancipation movements.

The emancipation of women can be defined as their liberation from religious, legal, economic, and sexual oppression, as well as their access to higher education and their escape from narrow gender roles, according to the Cambridge Dictionary. Any improvement in women's status has far-reaching effects and fundamentally alters politics in traditionally patriarchal societies. Therefore, the established II powers always oppose it. Karl Marx (1818–1833), among others, discussed political emancipation in his 1844 essay "On the Jewish Question," albeit frequently in opposition to or in addition to the term "human emancipation." "Equal status of individual citizens in relation to the state, equality before the law, regardless of religion, property, or other "private" characteristics of individual persons" were Marx's views on political emancipation in this work.

The Main Reason for Women's Low Status in Indian Society: In Indian society, women used to have rights, freedom, and autonomy. During the pre-Vedic era, when societies were found to be matriarchal, women were thought to be important. The matriarchal society was overtaken by the patriarchal society when the Aryan or Vedic culture emerged. However, women continued to have access to a wide range of educational opportunities, autonomy, and diverse rights. They played important roles in choosing their future partners and in religious ceremonies. They could study the Vedas and decide to remarry or have a marriage annulled. Remarrying a widow was also allowed. However, gender inequality led to a decline in women's status in the later Vedic period. Women were held back economically and denied access to fundamental human rights. They lacked independence and property rights. The strict rules that our lawgiver Manu imposed on them exacerbated the deterioration in their position that began in the later Vedic period.5

In his book Manusmriti (Kumar, 2016, p. 214), Manu "codified all social evils as social ethos instead of their eradication." Women were deprived of a variety of opportunities to acquire property, receive an education, and study religious scriptures under the influence of Manusmriti. The idea that ladies ought not be given opportunity and be made docile to male control got well established. The situation was made even worse by the Muslim invasion of our country and practices like the purdah system, polygamy, and Talak.

The British Raj in India gave Indian women new hope. Social reformers who were educated and well-informed attempted to cleanse Indian society of social vices. Swami Vivekananda and Raja Ram Mohan Roy, who supported widow remarriage and made arduous efforts to eradicate Sati, are worthy of mention here. The education of women was Jyotiba Phule's lifelong goal. Mahatma Gandhi and Ishwar Chandra Vidyasagar also fought for women's rights (Kumar, 2016, p. 214).

According to Kavitakait (2013), Dr. Ambedkar blamed Manusmriti for the plight of Indian women. He had faith in Buddha Dharma, which promotes women's education, self-respect, and equality. Ambedkar's conception of women is very similar to the demands of global feminists to treat women like men, guarantee their right to education, property, and participation in politics.

5 B. R. Ambedkar’s newspaper Mook Nayak or The Mute Hero became instrumental in raising the cause of the untouchables in 1920. Bahishkrit Bharat or India Ostracized was started in 1927 (Dr. B. R. Ambedkar’s Caravan, 2015).
Ambedkar's view that it is a crime to keep females subservient to males echoes that of J. S. Mill. If we want a developed world that is committed to human rights, we need to strengthen the half of the world's women. He spoke out against the social order that teaches women to submit, forces women to remain submissive to male dominance, and encourages typical feminine behavior through his writing. He had confidence in a nexus among station and orientation and declared that end of orientation is a characteristic culmination of demolition of standing. Ambedkar asserts that the growing disparities between groups were the primary factor in the rise of caste. Castes were confined groups that exercised endogamy over women's sexuality. He claimed that all forms of exploitation were solely attributable to the caste–gender nexus. His hypothetical information, and individual experience of being embarrassed a few times due to his rank position, empowered him to grasp the connection among station and orientation. Ambedkar was of the opinion that social democracy, which ensures a way of life based on equality, liberty, and brotherhood, is necessary for political democracy to be successful. He felt the urgent need to ensure women's rights and elevate their status and position as a positive step toward this achievement (Dhara, 2016).

Dr. Ambedkar's contribution to the emancipation and empowerment of women in India: Ambedkar's perspective on women's oppression, social democracy, caste, and the Hindu social order and philosophy is significant to modern Indian feminist thinking because of the operations of caste at the systemic level and at the functioning of patriarchy, as well as the growing caste/class divide in feminist political discourse. Despite Ambedkar's genius and reputation as a great thinker, philosopher, revolutionary, supreme jurist, prolific writer, social activist, and critic—he strode like a colossus in the Indian sociopolitical scene until his death—his thoughts never received sufficient attention in the general population of Indian society due to the fact that he was born an untouchable. The contemporary social realities, on the other hand, call for a close look at the breadth of his vision, the depth of his analysis, the rationality of his outlook, and the essential humanity of his suggestions for practical action. As a result, Ambedkar serves as a significant source of inspiration for the Indian women's movement to develop a feminist political agenda that simultaneously addresses issues of class, caste, and gender in the contemporary sociopolitical environment, which maintains conservative and reactionary values in many ways, particularly in relation to gender relations. Ambedkar's writings and speeches show how India's social and political institutions would be modernized by developing these values. Women, according to Ambedkar, were the victims of the caste-based, oppressive, and rigidly hierarchical social system.

Mook Nayak and Bahishkrit Bharat, Ambedkar's renowned journals, became platforms for speaking out against gender inequality and the need for women's rights. Under Ambedkar's leadership, the women's movement went through three phases: Women's participation, along with men, in the movements of the 1920s, such as the temple entry movements, the establishment of independent organizations for women in the 1930s, and the political organization of women under the All India Depressed Classes Mahila Federation in the 1940s. According to Dhara (2016), 25,000 women attended a 1942 conference held in Nagpur. His speeches and ideas had a big impact on women.
Positive steps to organize and empower women so that they could fight to reclaim their social rights included the launch of the "Mahad Satyagraha" in 1927, a bonfire of Manusmriti in 1927, the Kalaram Temple Entry Satyagraha in 1930, and the establishment of a women's association in 1928 in Bombay (Singariya, 2014, p. 2). He was successful in bringing about a significant shift in their way of life. He wanted them to live extravagantly. As a result, he insisted that they refrain from displaying ornaments or clothing that would suggest their low status. He advised women to refrain from having a large number of children and to devote their time to other activities because child rearing is a difficult process (Dhara, 2016).

Ambedkar emphasized women's right to property, equal treatment with men, education, and political participation. He asked them to abandon all traditionalism, embrace modern values, and develop a progressive outlook because he wanted to free them from the old rituals, rituals, and superstitions. Additionally, he included them in the process of eliminating castes (Bakshi, 2017). Dr Ambedkar a solid devotee to the strength of ladies said:The degree of progress that women have made is how I gauge the progress of the community. Every bridesmaid should stand by her husband, claim to be his friend and equal, and refuse to be his slave. If you follow this advice, I'm sure your shelves will be adorned with honor and glory. (Page 2 of Singariya, 2014). Being roused by his thinking in the Kalaram Sanctuary Passage Satyagraha at Nasik in 1930, 500 ladies were captured. The Samata Sainik Dal was founded by women. Radhabhai Vadale spoke at a press conference in support of women's rights and against all forms of exploitation, inspired by Ambedkar's courage for women. Chokhamela was the name of the newspaper that Tulsibhai Bansole started. Under the influence of his teachings, David, a brothel mediator, quit his job. Ambedkar also opposed the devdasi system, child marriage, and prostitution (Singariya, 2014, p. 3). The year 1924 is particularly huge for ladies as in this year, Dr B. R. Ambedkar, as an individual from Bombay Regulative Board, upheld family arranging and presented the Maternity Advantage Bill.

According to Kumar (2016), p. 396, "it is in the interest of the nation that the mother ought to get a certain amount of rest during the prenatal period." The Maternity Benefit Act was then enacted by the Madras Legislative Council and other provinces in 1934. He was successful in passing the Mines Maternity Benefit Bill for women across the nation from 1942 to 1946. A national Maternity Benefit Act was enacted in 1961 by the central government. He argued that men and women should be paid the same amount and introduced the concept of equal pay for equal work. This is provided by state policy directive principles in Article 39(d). He advocated for women's right to vote. Ambedkar was a strong proponent of women's education because he was convinced that it could benefit the entire family (Ambeth, 2015). Additionally, he stated, "I strongly support women's organizations." If they are convinced, I know what they can do to improve society. They have done a great job of eliminating social problems (Kumar, 2016, p. 397). He once insisted that prostitutes give up their jobs and lead honorable lives. Due to his tireless efforts, the Indian Constitution guarantees women's social and economic rights and justice. The following are a few examples of products that help women advance in society:

- Within the boundaries of India, equality before the law and equal legal protection are guaranteed by Article 14 of the Constitution.
Discrimination based on religion, race, caste, sex, or place of birth is against the law in Article 15. The state is able to make positive discrimination in favor of women and children under Article 15 (3). In matters pertaining to public employment, Article 16 guarantees equality of opportunity. Both forced labor and human trafficking are outlawed by Article 23. The state is obligated to provide equal means of subsistence and pay for equal work under sections (a) and (d) of Article 39. The state is required by Article 42 to provide maternity leave and just and humane working conditions. Article 51 A (e) forces a crucial obligation on each resident to repudiate the practices slanderous to the pride of ladies. Article 243 D (3) stipulates that women must hold at least one third of the seats in each panchayat that will be filled through direct election. Women are required to hold at least one-third of the total number of direct-election seats in each municipality, as stipulated in Article 243 T (3). Scheduled Caste and Scheduled Tribe women are granted a reservation in the municipal chairperson position in accordance with Article 243 T(4).

The Hindu Code Bill of 1949 in the Constituent Assembly was one of Dr. B. R. Ambedkar's most significant contributions to women's advancement and advancement of their status. It was an effort to enshrine the Hindu personal law in writing. In the years following India's independence, the fact that different laws governed society was a major issue. Dr. B. R. Ambedkar and Jawaharlal Nehru, two outstanding individuals, came up with the idea for it. The bill's primary goal was to improve the nation as a whole, including women. It sought to concentrate on two primary goals: a) elevating women's status and b) eliminating all inequalities and disparities. It aimed to legalize only monogamous marriages and end the prevalence of various marriage systems (Katulkar, 2008). The code granted women property and adoption rights that Manu denied them. Equality was advocated for between men and women in the legal system.

Dr. Ambedkar declared: I should like to draw attention of the house to one important fact. The great political philosopher Burke who wrote his great book against the French Revolution said that those who want to conserve must be ready to repair. And all I am asking this House is: if you want to maintain the Hindu system, Hindu culture and Hindu society do not hesitate to repair where repair is necessary. The bill asks for nothing more than to repair those parts of the Hindu system which have become dilapidated. (Singariya, 2014, p. 3).
Relevance of Ambedkar’s Contribution: Dr. B. R. Ambedkar insisted that Hindu society be rebuilt on a foundation of equality. He assumed the responsibility to free women from the "age old thralldom" by reforming the social laws created by Manu while serving as law minister and chairman of the Drafting Committee (Singariya, 2014, p. 3). His work as a social reformation and his writings contributed significantly to women's empowerment. According to Shukla (2011), the National Policy for the Empowerment of Women of 2001 acknowledged that Ambedkar's earlier depiction of social and economic structure is largely to blame for gender inequality. Women's education, self-help groups, capacity building and skill formation training, an emphasis on women's and children's development, employment facilities, women's participation in politics, and the establishment of the National Commission for Women are just a few of the many initiatives the government has taken to promote women's empowerment (Kavitakait, 2013)⁶

The five-year plans have taken positive steps to encourage women's development. The focus on women's well-being has been replaced by empowerment over the past few decades in planned development. They have portrayed in the panchayats. Our Constitution embodies the ideal of gender equality. Positive discrimination is provided for by the state. Despite the fact that Indian women have made some progress, they continue to suffer from a variety of social ills like kidnapping, violence, crime, humiliation, dowry, acid attacks, eve teasing, rape, and honor killing⁷.

According to data, the number of incidents of harassment by spouse and other relatives, both in the house of the father and in-laws, is on the rise. In India, 46% of women are illiterate, according to the data. Redressing the disparities and imbalances will take several decades. A greater demand for women's rights demonstrates that much remains unfinished. Despite the fact that they have gained political, economic, legal, and social power, women's rights have received scant attention.

According to Tiwari & Meshram, n.d., they are not treated similarly to men. There are two types of women's rights movements in India: one from the wealthy and the other from the poor; the first was influenced by Western philosophy, while the second was run by workers fighting for their rights. The fact that Ambedkar's ideas were not included in the first type of women's empowerment movement is a significant omission. The lower caste women's issues have not been adequately addressed by the feminist movement in India, nor have their rights been adequately protected. The Vishakha Guidelines on Sexual Harassment in the Workplace, which do not apply to the unorganized section, show this exclusion. On September 2, 2012, the Sexual Harassment at Workplace Bill was passed by the Lok Sabha to prevent workplace sexual harassment. The Sexual Harassment of Women at Workplace (Prevention, Prohibition, and Redressal) Act, 2013 was enacted in 2013.

⁶National Commission of Women, a statutory body, was constituted in 1992 under the National Commission for Women Act, 1990, to ensure legal and constitutional safeguards for women to seek redressal of various grievances and make policy suggestions (National Commission for Women, 2017, http://ncw.nic.in/).

⁷The killing of women in the name of honour when she dares to choose her life partner against the accepted social mores, a step taken to punish her collectively by the family and the community (Haile, 2007).
It incorporates the recommendations made by the Supreme Court in the Vishakha v. State of Rajasthan Case. Lower caste women, who make up 70% of the unorganized sector, are denied the right to receive equal pay. According to Sawant (2015), the two deeply ingrained evils of our society the caste system and patriarchy can only bring about emancipatory changes and prevent the recurrence of Nirbhaya. Dr. B. R. Ambedkar's long-held goal of emancipating and strengthening women can be accomplished through constitutional provisions as well as a shift in people's hearts and attitudes. All obstacles to women's development can be overcome through collaboration between the government and the women themselves.

Conclusions: The preceding analysis demonstrates that Ambedkar was one of India's greatest organic intellectuals of the 20th century. He was a symbol of women's revolt against all forms of oppression. He accorded them social equality. Freedom, equality, and brotherhood are the guiding principles of his ideal society. Through social, political, economic, and legal actions for women's emancipation and empowerment in India, he significantly reduced the issues they faced. To strengthen their position in society, he advised women to participate actively in all activities. He used a multi-pronged strategy for women's empowerment in a society with a high caste stratification for this reason. Presumably, he will be recognized as the emancipator and boss of ladies' privileges. Ambedkar's ideas would still be relevant to women's issues today and would be equally relevant in the future. In spite of some obstacles, his legacy of improving many women through various government actions continues in India, and his vision of women's empowerment is in sight. Because he was an advocate for women's rights and a feminist, he will be remembered for a long time.

Dr. B. R. Ambedkar's contribution lies in the fact that he laid the foundation of a new social order that considers empowerment of all sections of society essential for the overall development of a country. He was a true pathfinder for women in India and a symbol of revolt against all oppressions and injustices. We can conclude with an echo of his thought: "Without the involvement of women, unity, education, or agitation become meaningless and fruitless."

Suggestions: Despite the remarkable strides made in the emancipation of women in India through the contributions of Dr. Ambedkar, there are still challenges that need to be addressed. To build upon his legacy and achieve further progress, the following suggestions are proposed:

- Strengthening women's education: Continued efforts should be made to improve access to quality education for girls and women, especially in rural and marginalized communities. Initiatives to provide scholarships, mentorship programs, and safe learning environments will enhance educational opportunities and promote women's empowerment.

- Combating gender-based violence: Addressing the issue of gender-based violence remains crucial. Legal reforms and enforcement mechanisms must be strengthened to ensure swift justice for victims of violence. Awareness campaigns and community engagement can help challenge societal norms that perpetuate violence against women.

- Enhancing women's political representation: While significant progress has been made in women's political participation, there is still a need to increase the representation of women in decision-making bodies. Political parties and institutions should actively promote and support women candidates, fostering a more inclusive and diverse political landscape.

- Promoting economic opportunities: Efforts to provide women with equal economic opportunities and financial independence are essential. Skill development programs, access to credit facilities, and support for women entrepreneurs will enhance economic empowerment and reduce gender disparities.

- Addressing intersectionality: Recognizing and addressing the unique challenges faced by women from marginalized backgrounds, such as Dalit women, is crucial. Intersectional approaches to policy-making and social initiatives will ensure that the most vulnerable women receive targeted support.
